12. Daniel and his friends had every excuse for compromising God's Word. They might have felt as if God had forsaken them. Why should they be faithful to God, if he (apparently) had not protected them from captivity? No other Hebrew boys cared about following the food laws in this situation. Why should they be so conscientious? You must not be fanatical. The king had shown them great kindness. It could be perceived as rude to refuse the food. Maybe the king would be upset and they might lose their lives? And if they give in on this point, perhaps they could be more like the Babylonians and increase their chances of witnessing about the true God? These thoughts must undoubtedly have crossed these young men's minds. What did Daniel decided to do? (Dan. 1:8-13)
